"This is my sister, Miss Dillman, Mr. Dunn. She has come to spend a month or two with me. I ought to warn you that she is a most incorrigible flirt, so that you"—

"Why, Molly Ware?" her sister exclaimed in a horrified tone, while the doctor laughed. "What are you saying?"

"Just what is true," Mrs. Ware said defiantly. "He might just as well know it now, at the beginning of the acquaintance, as to be stunned by my silence later on. At all events, my conscience will be clear for having done my duty at the start."

"By the way you talk, Molly, one would think that I made a practice of going about seeking whom I could devour," said Miss Dillman recently. "It's very unbecoming of you to betray one of my blood bought accomplishments to Dr. Dunn. It's downright brutal!"

"Then you plead guilty to the charge, watching her admiringly. 'Never! And I warn you that my case will be tried among those 'not proved.'"

"I don't know about that. I shall work hard gathering evidence." "I defy you,"

"And I'll convict you," he retorted, laughing. Mrs. Ware and he had been sitting in a shady corner of the piazza, she in her invalid chair and he opposite, when Barbara strolled out and joined them, a vision of blond loveliness in violet.

As his carriage drove up to the gate for the third time he arose to take leave reluctantly—reluctantly because the sunlight of the girl's beauty had got into his eyes and dazzled him. She sauntered to the edge of the piazza.

"Is it no more than fair to warn you that as a detective I shall watch you closely," he said, smiling up at her. "As a detective only?" she said, with an arch laugh.

"There are untold possibilities in the duties of a detective," he said, raising his hat. "I shall exhaust those first."

When he had gone, she resumed her low chair beside her sister. "Molly," she said reproachfully, "you are a very mean girl. Now he'll expect me to flirt with him, and I'll have to do it."

"What of that?" "Didn't you know that I had come down here to reform?"

"Your surprise is disheartening." "I intend it to be. I have set my heart upon a match between you and the doctor. He's very wealthy and has a fine practice besides. It would be an excellent thing for you, Barbara, dear, and would please Aunt Nell so much. She has done a great deal for us both, you know."

The girl's face darkened with pain. "I spent such a horrible winter," she said in a low voice—"one refusal after another. Oh, Molly, in passion!"

"Oh, Molly, in passion!" she said, "if only I had some money of my own and could marry for love, how sweet it would be!"

Mrs. Ware's eyes filled with tears. "I couldn't," she said gently; then added comfortingly, "but I was not unhappy in my marriage. John was a very kind husband, and I have missed him sorely since his death. Your beauty ought to be some sort of compensation to you, dear. I was fairly staggered by it. Aunt Nell has done wonders for you."

"Yes, Aunt Nell and her tailor!" "Well, anyway you will do your best to captivate my doctor, won't you?"

"Oh, he's like all the rest—diplo-matic, absolutely in good form, cultivating only those in high places, with one eye on the god Mammon, the typical physician in ordinary to swindler. A beautiful, tactful, well-governed wife would be of assistance to him. Would she be anything more? Has he any heart under that well-groomed, well-tailored exterior?"

"Barbara, we might just as well look upon this question dispassionately, for we both know how necessary it is for you to marry, and marry well."

Barbara went to the end of the piazza and stood looking out at the hills for a moment. She returned, smiling.

"Now I'll be good," she said softly, "and I'll do my best to captivate your stupid old doctor. You must mind my calling him that, dear, for by so standing. But, oh, Molly, if ever I meet Love face to face, what explanation will he demand?"

Mrs. Ware could not reply. She stared into space with so melancholy an expression that Barbara laughed by way of diverting her.

Her sister looked up alarmed by the mischievous light in her eyes. "Barbara," she said entreatingly, "if he falls in love with you, you will not throw him over, will you, dear?" "He might go off and shoot himself, and if Aunt Nell should hear of—his death and lay it to your doings!"

"She'd never hear of it. We'd, dear," she said, "we'd bury him out in the potato patch and never divulge the awful secret. But really, my dear, you do not know doctors. They never kill themselves if they are disappointed in love. They always take it out on their charity patients."

"Mrs. Ware sighed patiently. 'I don't know that he has any charity patients.' 'Just so,' said Miss Dillman, with finality. 'I'll make him bring me face to face with one or prove him too fond of catering to the rich to do charitable work among the poor.'"

"Doctor," she began artfully, "have you any good patients—let's?" "Left!" he echoed, puzzling over the seeming afterthought. "I have some. Why?"

"Would you—er—take me to call upon one?" "Would you really go?" he asked, looking at her averted face with a passionate light in his eyes.

Barbara felt strangely isolated. Somehow a breath of tragedy had blown across her little comedy, chilling it and her.

"Stupid—stupid—stupid!" she repeated, with miserable self-reproach, as she awaited him outside in the fresher air. "Barbara Dillman, if you've a spark of decency, apologise to him for that word!"

They drove on into the woods in silence, and grave and she for the first time in her life all drift from her worldly self.

"Will it live?" she faltered at last, trying not to wink lest a tear fall. "I fear not," he said sadly and looked at her just as the tear fell. A great change swept over him. He bent low. "Thank God for that, Barbara!" he said huskily.

She struggled wildly, but hopelessly, in her heart's coolness. "Stupid, but—"

"My heart and soul are yours, dear. Is there any hope for me?" As his hand closed over hers, she felt a thrill of joy. "If you were not so—stupid—stupid, but—but—"

"If you were not so—stupid—stupid, but—but—"

"But what?" he demanded. "Dear!" she said tremulously, but with a laugh like music.
